A Medicopolitical Plot in Austria Against the Natural Anticancer Agent Ukrain

by Professor Serge Jurasunas

Many Townsend Letter readers know me from my frequent articles about cancer. I am pleased to have received so many e-mails from colleagues that appreciate my work; I am grateful.

As you may know, I am deeply involved with cancer treatment and have practiced nearly 45 years. This is not an easy task, especially when patients come to you in poor or even desperate condition, have tumors that induce strong resistance to chemotherapy, or are suffering from severe adverse effects and worse. Either way, we try to collaborate with conventional medicine by combining complementary treatment, but often we may have to treat cancer patients without chemotherapy, if patients no longer respond or categorically refuse more chemo. While there is no need to criticize conventional therapy, even if we are far from the expectation of medicine curing cancer, conventional oncology cannot monopolize the right to treat cancer.

When chemotherapy does not always work, we just cannot send patients home to die. Over the past years, I have been aware of so many failures of chemotherapy/radiation, not only from my own patients. Simultaneously there are continual pressures by health authorities to intimidate doctors treating patients with nonconventional therapies, and thus a serious question comes to mind: Is our medical system really looking out for the benefit of cancer patients without conflict of interest?

Dr. Wassil Nowicky arrested by the police

An example of this medical terrorism was the premeditated planning to remove from the market several efficient natural anticancer medicines, with the help of local governmental health authorities, over the past 30 years. Tactics implemented by the authorities deemed these medications illegal for use, and coincided with media attacks utilizing several scenarios:

1. A new license was not granted for manufacture.
2. A media campaign, at the behest of the Big Pharma cartel with disinformation denouncing the toxicity of the product being dangerous resulting in the health authorities removing it from the market.
3. A plot was organized to arrest people and with coordinated media articles, written with the intent to destroy the researcher's reputation and product.

No doubt you have heard the saying "It can't happen here," or "History repeats itself." As an international community, if we are complacent and do not speak up, by being passive, we condone these abusive activities. This in fact is the reason for this article.

Indeed I am thankful to Dr. Jonathan Collin, publisher of the Townsend Letter, for asking me to write about this tragic story. For the past 25 years I personally used the natural chemotherapeutic agent Ukrain, which demonstrated efficacy in the treatment of many types of cancer.[1]

Ukrain has been widely used in Europe in several integrative medicine and oncology clinics, not only as a treatment for cancer patients but also as the subject of clinical trials, which have been gathered, documented, and published.

Many articles have already been published wherein Ukrain has been evaluated in randomized tests on various types of cancer. Sometime in September 2012, through an Internet search I was informed about the arrest
